

Space and Frequency Rhythm Lab

8 - 23 June 2005
Vanderbilt Hall
at Grand Central Terminal
New York

On June 8th, a series of musical performances kicks off at majestic Vanderbilt Hall in Grand Central Terminal, centered around the monumental, site-specific sound sculpture set up by German artist Lukas Kühne.

Vanderbilt Hall's transformation into a Rhythm Lab is one of the highlights of the large-scale exhibition "Germany – A Sense-Sational Experience" from June 3 – June 23, made possible by the German Agricultural Marketing Board (CMA), the German National Tourist Office, the Goethe-Institut New York and The German Information Center.

The sound sculpture, created by Lukas Kühne, consists of several wooden sub-bass, marimba-like bars. World-renowned musicians Robyn Schulkowsky and Joey Baron, along with a breathtaking line-up of guest artists, are sure to create some good vibrations using the sound sculpture.

Lukas Kühne

is a German sculptor whose works have been shown in Europe and North and South America. Kühne works with different "materials" such as light, wood, and sound. Together with Robyn Schulkowsky, he created and developed the Marimbons, and founded the Marimbon Ensemble Montevideo (MEM) in 2003.

Robyn Schulkowsky

is a percussionist and composer. Before moving over to Germany in 1980 to work with Karlheinz Stockhausen and the Cologne School of composers, she taught percussion at the University of New Mexico, Albuquerque, and has been part of the German New-Music-scene ever since.

Joey Baron

was born in Richmond, Virginia. Since 1964, Mr Baron has performed backing up jazz legends Carmen McRae and Hampton Hawes. He moved to NYC in 1982, where his diverse talents and musicality aligned him with artists such as Laurie Anderson, Jay McShann, and Big Joe Turner. Currently through solo concerts and with his band, Joey Baron continues to showcase his compositions and playing; always exploring his own brand of lyrical, soulful music.
